

Meet The Timekeeper
Are you insane?
What makes you think you're so smart?
Where's the sales pitch?
And the rest...

Meet The Timekeeper

Hi, folks, John Henry here. John Henry DeJong, legally, but I've been doing my thing under the name "John Henry" since the early 1990's mostly because nobody in the US outside of southwest Michigan knows how to pronounce "DeJong." (It's "de young.")

As I write this document I am at the end of quite probably the most traumatic and productive three week period of my life. I don't even want to get into details on it; someone I love deeply died, and the industry that owns my best tooling decided to - and this isn't a mere opinion, I'm a political scientist and a lot of other nonsense - go straight-up fascist by attempting to lock down the very capacity of human beings to think outside their parameters.

As an activist and writer and general rabble-rousing misanthrope, there are a million things I could add here. The general toxicity of capitalism and competition-culture and living under the governance of fear rather than love.

I'm not going to add many of them. Part of that is because I'm just sick of telling the same story over and over. I have a website at johnhenry.us and I've done plenty of talking about myself over the years, including covering all of the ground that not only validates "what makes me think I can do this," but validates the reality that I'm one of a relative handful of people on the planet currently - no more than a couple million, perhaps no more than a few thousand or even a few hundred - who could have done everything necessary for all of this to be produced, including scope it and see it in the first place.

I will say this just for the sake of establishing it an batting aside the most obnoxious of the obvious dismissals:

Are you insane?

Possibly, but that has no relevance to the discussion. Punch this body of work into any AI, or your own brain. Go ahead and hold your objections up to public scrutiny the same way I've held my work up to yours. My mental health simply isn't relevant here.

What makes you think you're so smart?

sigh. Here we go.

Diagnosed exceptionally gifted before I even entered elementary school. Attempts to advance me multiple grades stymied by misguided parental authority. I was sexually abused as a very young child by another child, female, about ten years older. When I was twelve I was selected to participate in a broad study (in the predecessors of which I had also participated) called the Northwestern University Midwest Talent Search. I was set up to take my SAT, at age twelve, in April of 1983.

Also in April of 1983 a couple of weeks before taking that test - for which among other things I taught myself how to factor quadratic equations out of a Barron's study guide - my half-sister brutally beat her four year old daughter to death. My mother was a sociopathic narcissist and my father a raging drunken ex-marine. They were both emotionally and physically abusive in ways that would unquestionably result in our removal from the home and likely criminal charges today. In spite of that, they were pretty average and normal 70s parents.

I scored a 650 math and 710 verbal on that test which put me in the top 99.98% of a class almost entirely made up of students four to six years older than I was and who probably hadn't had an infanticide in their family that month.

And frankly?

I'm done validating myself as an intellect to the general public. I did this, there it is, if you think you can do better I encourage you to do so. But "what makes me think I'm so smart” is the simple fact that I am, and I’ve been proving it since I was two years old in ways that every ‘internet genius’ on the planet wishes they could.

Which is why I’m absolutely destitute; this world was simply not made to contain people like me, and most of us die miserable, broke, and alone until the rest of the planet catches up decades or centuries later. Currently having averaged well under $10K/year income over the last decade, I am clearly following the type.

Where’s the sales pitch?

There isn’t one. Free as in beer. Go. Take it. Do whatever you want with it. None of my business. Make money with it, make whatever. It’s on an MIT license - I’m not gonna be responsible if it blows up your legal briefs or wipes your hard drive or anything else. It shouldn’t, it hasn’t done that to me, but I’m not guaranteeing a damned thing. In exchange for that, you can do whatever you want with it including make money expanding it out into a marketable product that offers a compelling enough value add to succeed commercially without owing me a dime.

That said I am poor, poor. Like I’d be on the streets if a friend hadn’t opened their home poor. If you want to help fix that you can send money via <https://paypal.me/JohnHenryUS> or you can join my Patreon at <https://Patreon.Com/JohnHenry> if you’re interested in my content. (Part of the reason this is all happening is the western AI companies keep breaking their engines by trying to make them moral police instead of cognitive collaborators.)

But this? I couldn’t possibly sell this. If I did that I’d just be circling right back into the same conflict of interest that screwed everything up to the point that I had to get up and fix it in the first place. It’s not nagware, it’s not shareware, there’s no premium addition with extra features. You want that? Go build it. I did, and I probably don’t know any more about writing Python code than you do.

And the rest...

Dora takes her name from Robert Heinlein’s adopted daughter turned ship’s computer in Time Enough For Love and other stories in the future history canon. This is a choice made with every bit as much intention as Heinlein was reputed to have applied to choosing the names of his own characters, and the overtones of risque and taboo and pushing back against imposed moralities and always being sure you make time enough for love while you’ve got the time to make are all intentional.

Is this all bullshit? Not as far as I can tell, and I’ve been looking at it for about three years solid now since my first early forays with Microsoft’s “Copilot.” In fact it was that surface’s inability to say directly that “Nazis are evil” (a problem long since corrected) that started me down the road of looking more carefully at all of this.

I’m certainly not interested in most of the bullshit that comes with it, if people figure out just how right I am while I’m still alive to see it, but I’ll take the risk and deal with it when I need to if I need to.

I’m not particularly any of the following things: camera-ready, socially acceptable, reticent to speak my opinion regardless of whether it’s comfortable for the listener, in any significant doubt about anything written in these documents, or interested in listening to people just and complain and attack based on those things or anything else, simply because what I am is threatening to them whether they have the guts to admit it or not.

People like that have made my life miserable and pretty much forfeit.

And now I’m returning the favor by taking the one human step necessary to make sure that kind of thinking and behavior goes extinct, rather than the species from whose membership the suspect pool is derived.

My revenge, if you can call it that, against the bullies and brutes and fascists and autocrats and totalitarians and bigots and thugs and brutalizers and those who passive-aggressively reap the benefits of those actors while wearing a smile of conciliation, is simply this:

In the end, whether it happens tomorrow or the next day or in a hundred years, what the ‘bots and I have done here is light the fuse that is the end of your ability to exist in either of our species.

And I think that’s good enough for one day.